Fifty-eight Salve Regina College students will return to the college campus on Labor Day, Monday, September 2, two weeks ahead of their classmates. These seniors are reporting early in time to begin assignments as student teachers in the Newport School system for the fall semester.

The students will cover every grade level and school in Newport County, fifty of them at the elementary and eight at the secondary level. They will attend a special meeting on Tuesday, September 3 at Rogers High School, when they will be addressed by Superintendent of Schools, Charles A. O'Connor, Jr. School principals and supervising teachers from the Newport schools have also been invited to attend.

Salve Regina's teacher training program will allow its students to work with Newport youngsters ranging from the educable retarded to the gifted intellectually. Six of the Salve Regina students will work with gifted pupils in grades IV and V at the newly assigned center at Cranston Calvert School, concentrating on special areas: English, Social Studies and Reading. At least two students will spend half of the total training period dealing with the special problems presented by educable retarded children.
